Town event seeks to collect pollutants

BY BILL
SAN ANTONIO

North Shore residents will be able to discard unwanted household items that may present chemical hazards next Saturday as part of the Town of North Hempstead's "Stop Throwing Out Pollutants" initiative.

The event – set to take place at Michael J. Tully Park in New Hyde Park from 9:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. – is the first of five "Stop Throwing Out Pollutants" collection drives scheduled to take place this year.

In a statement, North Hempstead Town Supervisor Judi Bosworth said the improper disposal of household waste is dangerous to one's health and the environment.

"We are committed to offer convenient and environmentally responsible options for members of the North Hempstead community to dispose of their dangerous chemicals, electronics, sensitive documents, pharmaceuticals and clothes," she said.

"Stop Throwing Out Pollutants" events will also take place on May 17 and Sept. 12 at Tully Park and at North Hempstead Beach Park in Port Washington on June 20 and Nov. 8.

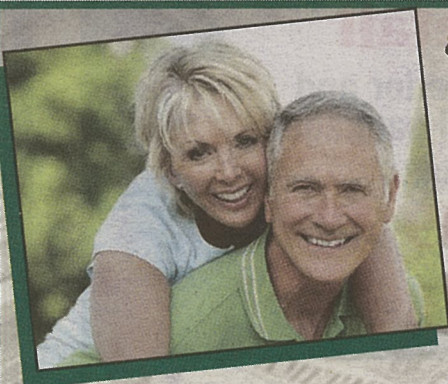

Items eligible for collection include aerosols, household chemicals, pesticides, disinfectants, fertilizers, bulbs, thermostats, rechargeable and lithium batteries, television sets, computers and oil-based paints, town officials said.

Auxiliary police will carry overdose antidote

BY BILL SAN ANTONIO

Nassau County's volunteer police officers who have completed training to use the opioid overdose prevention agent naloxone will be required to carry kits with the antidote while on duty, police officials announced Thursday.

The move aligns the county's auxiliary force with the full-time Nassau County Police Department, whose officers are required to be trained in administering naloxone – also known as Narcan – and have the antidote on hand while on patrol.

It is the latest effort by Nassau County Executive Edward Mangano's administration to combat fatal opioid and heroin overdoses throughout the county.

According to figures from the county Medical Examiner's office, there were 51 fatal heroin overdoses and 123 prescription drug-related deaths in Nassau in 2014.

"By ensuring both police officers and auxiliary police are trained to administer and carry Narcan, we guarantee more lives will be saved from this deadly epidemic," Mangano said.

Nassau County became certified in the state's Overdose Responder Program in 2012 and has since trained 3,600 residents in administering Narcan through frequent training programs.

Narcan kits distributed to police include two prefilled syringes of naloxone, paraphernalia for nasal administration, a pair of medical gloves and an instructions booklet for using the agent.

Nassau County police and ambulance technicians revived 258 people using naloxone in 2014, according to county figures.

"Although Naloxone kits have been a required piece of equipment on Nassau County Police ambulances for many years, the impact of it in the hands of our patrol forces has been tremendous," acting Nassau County Police Commissioner Thomas Krumpter said.

The kits were financed through the office of state Attorney General Eric Schneiderman, who has implemented several other anti-drug initiatives, including the formation of a multi-state task force targeting opioid and heroin trafficking.

"By providing police officers with naloxone, we are making this life-saving overdose antidote available in every town, village and hamlet on Long Island," he said.

Latex and water-based paints will not be accepted, as each can be disposed of safely once it has dried out, which generally takes 24-36 hours after its lid is removed, officials said.

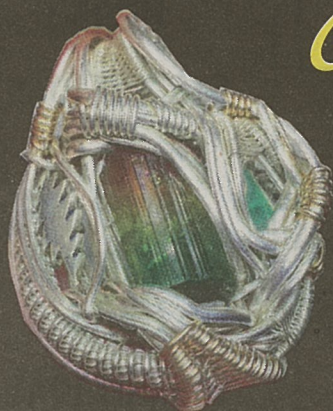

Clothing for donation to the non-profit Big Brothers, Big Sisters will also be collected, as well as stuffed animals, electronics, toys, sports equipment, shoes, books, small area rugs, bicycles, scooters, luggage, picture frames, table lamps, fabric, silverware, glassware, dishes and cosmetics, officials said.

Residents will also be permitted to shred sensitive documents during the event to safely prevent identity theft, officials said.

Unwanted pharmaceutical drugs will also be collected as part of the town's partnership with the Nassau County Police Department's drug take-back program, officials said.
